

RELATED

Pennsylvania
Supreme Court
Agrees to Review
Cases of Election
Irregularities

 191

Share Now

3453

Copy Link

President and CEO of Dominion Voting Systems John Poulos testifies during a hearing before Congress in Washington on Jan. 9, 2020. (Alex Wong/Getty Images)

PENNSYLVANIA

Dominion Cancels Planned Appearance Before Pennsylvania Lawmakers

RELATED

Pennsylvania
Supreme Court
Agrees to Review
Cases of Election
Irregularities

191

Share Now3453

Copy Link

BY ZACHARY STIEBER | November 20, 2020 Updated: November 20, 2020

Print

Dominion Voting Systems committed to attending an oversight hearing in Pennsylvania but backed out at the last moment, lawmakers in the Keystone State said Friday.

“The members of the state government committee were looking forward to publicly addressing the plethora of accusations of Dominion Voting Systems in a format which would have allowed open and honest dialogue. I was impressed at what appeared to be the willingness of Dominion Voting Systems to address accusations, and it would have put the 1.3 million Pennsylvanians who used their machines at ease, including myself,” state Rep. Seth Grove, a Republican who chairs the Government Oversight Committee, said during a press conference.

“Unfortunately, last evening, Dominion Voting Systems lawyered up and backed out of their commitment.”

Fourteen counties in Pennsylvania use Dominion’s voting systems. Approximately 1.3 million people, or 19 percent of voters, voted in those counties.

“Instead of running towards the light of honesty and integrity, Dominion Voting Systems retreated to the darkness. Why? Why would a vendor of public goods fear discussing their products sold to the public for the public good?” Grove said.

“If Dominion’s products were successful and operated as they were supposed to, why wouldn’t Dominion take the opportunity to publicly review its success? How hard is to say, ‘our ballot machines worked exactly as promised, and they are 100 percent accurate?’”

RELATED

Pennsylvania Supreme Court Agrees to Review Cases of Election Irregularities

191

Share Now

3453

Copy Link

Dominion did not respond to a request for comment.

The cancellation adds credibility to accusations against Dominion, state lawmakers said. They said Dominion has to earn the trust of Pennsylvanians.

Election workers count ballots in Philadelphia, Penn., on Nov. 4, 2020. (Spencer Platt/Getty Images)

“Most of us would agree here that we trust the workers in our polling places, and we trust the workers in our counties. They’re our neighbors and they are people that we elected. But what we don’t know, and therefore we can’t trust, is the role of third-party companies,” state Rep. Dawn Keefer, a Republican, said at the briefing.

RELATED

Pennsylvania Supreme Court Agrees to Review Cases of Election Irregularities

191

Share Now

3453

Copy Link

Dominion was given the chance “to demonstrate who they were, the services they were providing, the products that they were selling us and how they were being utilized, and give the voters the confidence that they’re looking for,” she added.

Questions that would have been asked included whether Dominion had a role in the tabulation of votes, whether Dominion machines use open source software, and who controls the source code.

Grove suggested subpoenas are possible.

Dominion has a lengthy statement on its website that it last updated on Nov. 17. The company challenged some of the claims made about Dominion machines, including allegations that the company deleted millions of votes for President Donald Trump.

Dominion says it is a nonpartisan company, although it has acknowledged connections with the Clinton Global Initiative and a former staffer to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Trump and his campaign have said Dominion systems are not secure and they have filed lawsuits in Pennsylvania contesting the unofficial election results.

Counties in Pennsylvania face a Nov. 23 deadline to certify the results.

According to the Pennsylvania Department of State’s count, Democratic presidential nominee Joe Biden received over 81,000 more votes than Trump.

Follow Zachary on Twitter: @zackstieber

RELATED

Did you find this article informative? Share this article with a friend.

Copy Link

3453 Shares

Pennsylvania
Supreme Court
TOP NEWS
Agrees to Review

3453
2020 Election
McEnany: Trump Should Not
(f (t e (e
'Constitutional Process'
7 Copy Link ut

16

PENNSYLVANIA
Pennsylvania House Votes
for Non-Partisan 2020
Election Audit

32

INDIA
71 Percent Indians Refused to Buy Chinese Products This
Festival Season: Survey

15

PENNSYLVANIA

Williams College Mathematician Flags up to n

Pennsylvania
Supreme Court
Agrees to Review
Cases of Election
Irregularities

191

Share Now

3453

Copy Link

JUDICIARY

Supreme Court Agrees to hear Rhode Island
Warrantless Gun-Seizure Case

14

JUDICIARY

Supreme Court Grants
Request to Drop Hearing on
Mueller Grand Jury
Documents

9